PREFACE TO THE ORIGINAL EDITION.

4 Aug. 19 Macmillan & Co. 75

In submitting to the public a new edition of "Moore's Irish Melodies," the publishers have been influenced by a desire to present that popular work in a more perfect form than it has hitherto assumed,—when regarded from a musical point of view. It is now universally acknowledged that the symphonies and accompaniments of Sir John Stevenson are by no means irreproachable in a merely technical sense; nor do they exhibit that appropriate national colouring for which they have so long enjoyed the credit. Moore's frequently-expressed opinion of their efficiency has saved them, in a great measure, until now, from being too closely and critically examined. In the well-known Prefatory Letter on Music, originally prefixed to the Third Number of the "Irish Melodies," and addressed to the Marchioness Dowager of Donegal, the accomplished Poet attempts to defend Sir John Stevenson from the charge—mirabile dictu: of having spoiled the simplicity of the airs by the chromatic richness of his symphonies, and the elaborate variety of his harmonies." "We might," he says, "cite the example of the admirable Haydn, who has sported through all the mazes of musical science in his arrangement of the simplest Scottish melodies; but it appears to me that Sir John Stevenson has brought to this task an innate and national feeling, which it would be vain to expect from a foreigner, however tasteful or judicious." That this was no ephemeral sentiment, but one founded on thorough conviction, we may conclude from the fact that the last of the "Irish Melodies"—"Silence is in our festal halls"—is devoted to an elegy on Sir John Stevenson.

Moore's best apology for the extraordinary estimation in which he held the musical talent and attainments of his friend and coadjutor is derived from the little knowledge of music which the Poet himself possessed. With all his instinct for tune, and with an ear exquisitely sensitive and refined, Moore was but little acquainted with the rules of harmony, and consequently unfitted to hazard an opinion on the subject. Nay, not only was he unlearned in the art, but we even find him endeavouring to palliate his own ignorance by suggesting that there may be a little pedantry in adhering too rigidly to the rules which interdict the occurrence of consecutive fifths. The truth is, had Moore been in the least degree familiar with music as a science, he would, in all probability, never have associated himself with Sir John Stevenson.

Bunting, in the second volume of his interesting and valuable treatise on Irish Music, appears to have been the first who had the courage to point out the want of character and simplicity in the "arrangements" of the "Melodies." Sir John Stevenson had a host of friends who took up his cause, and Moore himself stood forth his champion. The question, however, was not of sufficient public importance to lead to a public discussion; but when the copyright of the most attractive of the "Irish Melodies" was on the point of becoming general property, and new editions solicited investigation, the verdict was decidedly hostile to Sir John. The more his symphonies and accompaniments were examined, the graver faults were detected. That perhaps the most splendid national lyric monument ever bequeathed to the world should have been disfigured in any of its constituent parts, was to be lamented. Such exquisite melodies, and such brilliant poetry, deserved to be allied with more congenial harmony. So great, however, was the credit attached to prestige, and such the veneration in which tradition was held, that, despite their numerous errors of taste and performance, the symphonies and accompaniments to the "Irish Melodies" have up to this point been perpetuated.

When our best vocalists rejected ballad-singing,—for which their sympathies so happily beffitted them,—and endeavoured to soar into the regions of the Italian bravura,—for which nature and education had endowed them with no aptitude,—the "Irish Melodies" went out of fashion. This absurd preference for foreign and ornamental music endured so long, that it was feared the love of pure and unsophisticated melody had ceased to exist. Not so, however. With good interpreters of ballads, national music revived. To Mr. Sims Reeves, a master of all styles, the public are indebted, in a great measure, for the resuscitation of that taste for the simple and the natural which may be said to have slumbered since the days of Miss Stephens and John Braham. A new impetus has lately been given to the "Irish Melodies." Our current ballads, too frequently, are found "flat, stale, and unprofitable;" the public has grown satiated with "set phrases," in place of genuine melody; while modern poetry, still more than modern song, has created a feeling of distaste, if not of absolute contempt. It is not to be wondered at, then, that the lovers of simple music and unaffected poetry should revert from these ballads to the “Irish Melodies,” and return once more to the fountain-head. Such considerations have influenced the publishers in their present undertaking, and it is confidently hoped may be accepted as a sufficient apology.

In selecting Mr. M. W. Balfe to write new symphonies and accompaniments for the “Irish Melodies,” the publishers have been impelled by a desire to put the right man in the right place. An Irishman himself, and the most popular and experienced of our native composers, Mr. Balfe may be supposed to unite in his person the qualities of musicianship and national sensibility imperatively demanded for such a task. How well he has accomplished it must, nevertheless, be left for the public to decide.

Whatever diversity of opinion may exist as to the abstract merits of Moore’s poetry, the whole world has long agreed about his “Irish Melodies.” Upon these, indeed, is founded the Poet’s chief claim to Immortality. To the world at large, the “Melodies” are recommended by bright fancy, exquisite grace, harmony of numbers, charm of expression, infinite tenderness, rich colouring, never-failing invention, great variety, and inexhaustible felicity of illustration. To the Irish reader, they make their appeal on other and more sympathetic grounds. The “Melodies” breathe in every line the true spirit of patriotism and liberty. This feeling,—preserved from the year 1807, when the first Number appeared, to 1834, when the last Number was issued,—is as predominant in “Lay his sword by his side” (Number Ten), as in “Remember the glories of Brian the Brave” (Number One). Nevertheless, Moore’s patriotism has been questioned. He certainly did not, on all occasions, side with the Liberal Irish party; nor did he at any time bow down to the popular idols. Nevertheless, a more genuine Irishman, in the strictest sense of the word, never existed, nor one more deeply imbued with the love of country. His works, and the whole tenor of his life, prove this. The “Melodies” were not the only efforts of his genius consecrated to what he fondly cherished as the cause of Ireland. The principal story in his greatest poem, Lalla Rookh—“The Fire-worshippers”—was written, like these “Melodies,” in the cause of tolerance: the Ghebabs and their Moslem tyrants being intended to represent the Irish people and their English rulers. Need we say with what enthusiasm the subject has been handled? The story of Captain Rock, too, is as emphatic in every line as though it had been indited by the most patriotic “United Irishman” of ‘98. It is scarcely necessary to point to the History of Ireland, which speaks for itself. Those who are sceptical about Moore’s genuine patriotism, and the sincerity of his political opinions, should remember, that—an Irishman living among Englishmen, and a Catholic associating with Protestants, almost from boyhood—he never once ceased to advocate the claims of his country and religion. Nay, in one or two of the “Melodies,” he must needs have given mortal offence to some of his English friends, by the fearlessness of his expressions. Indeed, we cannot conceive how even the love of country, or a desire to exhibit Ireland’s pre-eminence, even in a work of fancy, could have warranted the animus conveyed in the following lines:—

“In England, the garden of beauty is kept
By a dragon of prudery placed within call;
But so oft that unamiable dragon has slept,
That the garden’s but carelessly watched after all.
Oh! they want the wild sweet-briery fence,
Which round the flowers of Erin dwells,
Which warms the touch while winning the sense,
Nor charms us least when it most repels.*

“Thomas Moore,”—spoke one who was himself an Irishman, and a poet, but who died too young for his fame,†—“was not merely the eager and impassioned advocate of general liberty, but a true lover of his country,—the denouncer of her wrongs,—the fearless vindicator of her rights;—a glorious contrast to the spiritless, slavish race that preceded him,—the Parnells, Roscommons, Goldsmiths, distinguished and celebrated in their day, but who scorned even to name the ill-fated land of their birth.”

The “Irish Melodies” are, perhaps, the purest national tribute ever bequeathed by a poet to his country. The world has long done them justice in the aggregate, but, with some exceptions, they are far from being as widely known, or as thoroughly appreciated, as they deserve. As a collection of songs, they constitute a treasure almost unexampled. Of the Ten Numbers and Supplement, comprising one hundred and twenty-four songs, not more than one-fifth, or thereabouts, have achieved universal celebrity. This may in some measure be attributed to the absorbing interest attached to the favoured few—such as “ ‘Tis the Last Rose of Summer,” “The Minstrel Boy,” “The Harp that once through Tara’s Halls,” “I’d mourn the hopes that leave me,” “Norah Creina,” “Believe me, if all those endearing young charms,” “The Young May Moon,” &c., &c. The great popularity these have obtained, when compared with the rest, is owing to the familiar airs to which they are allied, rather than to any absolute and intrinsic superiority in themselves. There are many songs in the collection, which, upon a nearer acquaintance, would be found quite as interesting and quite as beautiful, and which, if introduced into the concert-room, would gain as lasting a reputation. While artists seek in vain, from modern composers, with rare exceptions, for songs to charm the multitude, they may find among the “Irish Melodies” all that is required in point of exquisite melody and poetical grace. It is not too late to open the volume. That such rare and exquisite beauties have been too long overlooked, is the opinion of all who have given the subject any consideration. The reception which some of the “Melodies” invariably receive in the present day, when heard in public, should stimulate vocalists to explore the rich and yielding mine whence such gems were dug out, as likely to conceal others no less brilliant.

† Thomas Furlong, the translator of “Carolan’s Remains,” and other ancient poems and songs, died at the age of 33. He was pronounced by Daniel O’Connell second only, as a poet, to Thomas Moore.—See Hardiman’s Irish Minstrelsy, vol. I.

The publication of a Collection of Irish Melodies with Characteristic Symphonies and Accompaniments, and with poetry illustrative of the manners and history of the country, originated with the late Mr. J. Power, the well-known music-seller in the Strand. Sir John Stevenson was engaged to arrange the airs, and several distinguished literary men had promised their assistance in the poetical department. Moore, we believe, was not thought of at first, and, when his name occurred to the projectors, it was only in conjunction with the names of others. The future bard of Erin had not won for himself in 1807 that immortal wreath which was destined to adorn his brow. At twenty-seven he had written a great deal; but the Odes of Anacreon, Epistles in Verse, Epithalamiums, Political Squibs, Comic Ballads, and such like effusions, could hardly be supposed to invest their author with a very high reputation—more especially when such men as Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Campbell, Rogers, and Walter Scott, were at that moment scattering their sweetest and choicest flowers. We can scarcely wonder, then, that Moore was not consulted in the first place, and consulted alone, when the new work on the National Music of Ireland was contemplated, inasmuch as he had not yet poetically identified himself with the land of his birth. In February, 1807, Moore undertook to co-operate in the new undertaking. He gave his whole heart and soul up to the task—as he himself expresses it—“of interpreting in verse the touching language of his country’s music.” Never did poet find more congenial occupation. Some of the songs were almost improvised, and the publishers were so delighted with what Moore had done, that they engaged him immediately to write the whole series. The reader will not be astonished at this, when he learns that in the first number was contained “The Harp that once thro’ Tara’s Halls,” “Fly not yet, ‘tis just the hour,” “Rich and rare were the Gems she wore,” and “The Meeting of the Waters.” The reception accorded to the new work was unprecedented, and Moore found himself all at once a Titan in an age of giants. To one part of the community only were the “Irish Melodies” unacceptable. The ruling powers were reported to have found fault with the licence taken by the poet in the expression of his opinions concerning Ireland’s connection with England; and the Irish Government, it was said, had interfered to stay the publication. In his preface to the Fourth Number of the “Melodies,” Moore himself acknowledges the rumour, but ascribes its foundation rather to the bigotry of the Government than to the character of the work. Whatever might have been his belief, so far from being deterred from the free utterance of his sentiments, he spoke out still more boldly and pointedly in the Fourth Number, especially in the song, “Avenging and bright falls the swift sword of Erin,”—the last verse of which might have afforded fair scope for prosecution to a hostile Attorney-General. The verse is as follows:—

“Yes, monarch! tho’ sweet are our home recollections,—
Tho’ sweet are the tears that from tenderness fall;
Tho’ sweet are our friendships, our hopes, our affections,
Revenge on a tyrant is sweetest of all!”

That great pains were expended on the poetry will readily be believed, when the polished refinement displayed in every line is considered, together with the felicitous turn of expression, and unsurpassed harmony of numbers. On an average, Moore occupied twelve months in writing as many of the Irish Melodies. Although the First Number was given to the world in 1807, it was not until the commencement of 1815 that the Sixth Number was finished. With this it was at first determined that the Work should be brought to a close. It was Moore’s own desire, and avowed by him in the preface. “We feel so proud,” he writes, “still more for our country’s sake than our own, of the general interest which this purely Irish Work has excited, and so anxious lest a particle of that interest should be lost by too long a protraction of its existence, that we think it wiser to take away the cup from the lip, while its flavour is yet, we trust, fresh and sweet, than to risk any further trial of the charm, or give so much as not to leave some wish for more." * * * * " Both pride and prudence counsel us to come to a close, while yet our Work is, we believe, flourishing and attractive, and thus, in the imperial attitude, 'stantes mori,' before we incur the charge either of altering for the worse, or, what is equally unpardonable, continuing too long the same." Had Moore adhered to this determination, some of the finest specimens of Irish ballad music might have been lost to the world, and the earlier "Melodies" have been deprived of several of their "loveliest companions." The airs in the last four Numbers have not achieved the popularity of their predecessors, although many are extremely beautiful, and all are interesting. In the last song of Number Six, "Dear Harp of my Country," Moore takes leave of his theme with a tender and characteristic sweetness. The concluding verse of the "Farewell" is peculiarly appropriate:—

"Dear Harp of my Country! farewell to thy numbers,
This sweet wreath of song is the last we shall twine !
Go, sleep with the sunshine of fame on thy slumbers,
Till touch'd by some hand less unworthy than mine.
If the pulse of the patriot, soldier, or lover,
Have throbb'd at our lay, 'tis thy glory alone ;
I was but as the wind, passing heedlessly over,
And all the wild sweetness I wak'd was thy own."

This is so pretty a climax that it seems almost a pity to have broken the spell of "sweet sorrow" in which the public were wrapt. But Moore knew his power, and how to use it. He has, with infinite tact, carried on the feeling of sadness conveyed by the last song of Number Six, in the opening song of Number Seven, "My Gentle Harp,"—one of the least known and most beautiful in the latter portion of the Work.

In all probability, Moore would have bidden adieu to the Irish Harp for ever in the Sixth Number, had he not been instigated to new endeavours by the melodies, "warranted Hibernian," with which he was inundated from all parts of the kingdom. Between the Sixth Number and the Tenth and last, however, there elapsed no less than nineteen years,—so that he had ample time for selection. The only songs in the second series which became favourites, and have maintained their influence, are "As slow our ship her foamy track," ("The girl I left behind me"), "Remember thee?—yes while there's life in this heart," "To Ladies' Eyes a Round, Boys," "Oh, banquet not in those shining Bowers," "And doth not a meeting like this make amends?" and "I wish I was by that dim lake,"—though these are not the most beautiful. Moore was particularly fond of the last number,—perhaps because it gave him more trouble than any of the others. "I am not without hope," he writes, in his dedication to the Marchioness of Headfort, "that, as far as regards the grace and spirit of the Melodies, you will find the closing portion of the Work not unworthy of what has preceded it. The sixteen airs, of which the Number and the Supplement consists, have been selected from the immense mass of Irish Music, which has been for years past accumulating in my hands; and it was from a desire to include all that appeared most worthy of preservation, that the four supplementary songs, which follow the Tenth Number, have been added."

A special interest, apart from its connection with the music, attaches to the poetry of the "Irish Melodies." Some of the songs claim historical association, which particularly endears them to the Irish reader; some comprise narratives that cannot fail to move the dullest sympathy; some, under the guise of impassioned love-pleadings, or lamentations, transfigure the poet's affection for his country, or his lamentations for her destiny; while many are simple effusions from the heart which appeal to the most unsophisticated understandings. That exquisite lyric, "Oh, breathe not his name, let it rest in the shade," was suggested by the well-known passage in the dying speech of the unfortunate Robert Emmet—"Let no man write my epitaph, * * * * "let my tomb remain uninscribed, till other times and other men shall learn to do justice to my memory." That eloquent and heart-felt poem, "Shall the Harp then be silent?" is a glowing tribute to Ireland's greatest patriot, Henry Grattan; and the last song in the collection is, as we have already stated, an elegy to the memory of Moore's friend and colleague in the work, Sir John Stevenson. To the lyric student, the "Irish Melodies" will prove one of the most instructive volumes in the English language. He who reads it carefully can hardly fail to profit by his labour. The smoothness and flow of the verse, the felicity of the diction, the brilliant fancy, the wit and deep feeling, the pointed allusions, and the grace that invests the whole with a halo of beauty, cannot, we think, be found in any other collection extant. Backed by such recommendations, the songs might claim the world's applause without the aid of music. Combined with music, every impulse of the heart becomes enlisted.

On this occasion a Song was written by one of our Bards, in which an Iri-h Virgin is made to give the preference to her dear Coulin (or the youth with the flowing locks), to all strangers (by which the English were meant), or those who wore their habits. Of this Song the air alone has reached us, and is universally admired."—WALKER'S Historical Memoirs of Irish Bards, page 184. In a metrical life of St. Senanus, which is taken from an old Kilkenny MS., and may be found among the Acta Sanctorum Hibernia, we are told of his flight to the island of Scattery, and his resolution not to admit any woman of the party; he refused to receive even a Sister Saint, St. Cannera, whom an Angel had taken to the island, for the express purpose of introducing her to him. The following was the ungracious answer of Senanus, according to his poetical biographer:—

*Cui Præsul: Quid fæminis
Commune est cum monachis?
Nec te nec ullam aliam
Admittemus in insulam.*

See the Acta Sancti, Hib., page 610.

According to Dr. Ledwich, St. Senanus was no less a personage than the river Shannon; but O'Connor, and other anti-quarians, deny the Metamorphose indignantly.

The musical score consists of six staves of music in common time, key signature of one flat, and includes lyrics in parentheses. The score is divided into three systems by vertical bar lines. The first system contains two staves: the top staff has a treble clef and the bottom staff has a bass clef. The second system contains two staves: the top staff has a treble clef and the bottom staff has a bass clef. The third system contains two staves: the top staff has a treble clef and the bottom staff has a bass clef. The music features various dynamics such as cres., p dim., and f. The lyrics are as follows:

The musical score consists of four systems of music, each with three staves: Treble, Bass, and a lower staff (likely Tenor or Alto). The key signature is B-flat major (two flats), and the time signature is common time (indicated by a 'C').

- System 1: Starts with a melodic line in the Treble staff. The lyrics are: "member, wher-e - ver your gob - let is crown'd, Thro' this world whether east-ward or west-ward you roam, When a". The bass staff has a dynamic marking of pp.
- System 2: Continues the melody in the Treble staff. The lyrics are: "cup to the smile of dear woman goes round, Oh! re-member the smile that a-dorns her at home." The bass staff has a dynamic marking of f.
- System 3: Features a rhythmic pattern in the Bass staff consisting of eighth-note pairs (eighth note down, eighth note up) repeated throughout the measure.
- System 4: Features a rhythmic pattern in the Bass staff consisting of eighth-note pairs (eighth note down, eighth note up) followed by a series of sixteenth-note patterns.

Having some reason to suspect that Kitty of Coleraine is but a modern English imitation of our style, I have thought it right to give an authentic Irish air to the same words, without, however, omitting the former melody, for which the words were originally written, and to which, I believe, they are best adapted. Paddy's Resource precedes the present air.

* The name of this beautiful and truly Irish air, is, I am told, properly written Cruachan na Feine, i.e. the Fenian mount, or mount of the Finnian heroes, those brave followers of Finn Mac Cool, so celebrated in the early history of our country.

The words of this song were suggested by the very ancient Irish story called “Deirdri, or the lamentable fate of the sons of Usnach,” which has been translated literally from the Gaelic, by Mr. O’FLANAGAN (see Vol. I. of Transactions of the Gaelic Society of Dublin), and upon which it appears that the “Darthula” of Macpherson is founded. The treachery of Conor, king of Ulster, in putting to death the three sons of Usna, was the cause of a desolating war against Ulster, which terminated in the destruction of Eman. “This story (says Mr. O’FLANAGAN) has been from time immemorial, held in high repute as one of the three tragic stories of the Irish. These are ‘The death of the children of Touran,’ ‘The death of the Children of Lear’ (both regarding Tuatha de Danans) and this, ‘The death of the Children of Usnach,’ which is a Milesian story.”—It will be recollectcd, that, in these Melodies, there is a Ballad upon the story of the Children of Lear or Lir: “Silent, oh Moyle!” &c.

Whatever may be thought of those sanguine claims to antiquity, which Mr. O’FLANAGAN and others advance for the literature of Ireland, it would be a very lasting reproach upon our nationality, if the Gaelic researches of this gentleman did not meet with all the liberal encouragement which they merit.

† “O Naisi ! view the cloud that I here see in the sky ! I see over Eman green a chilling cloud of blood-tinged red.” Deirdri’s song.

The musical score consists of four systems of music, each with two staves (treble and bass). The key signature varies between systems: System 1 (Measures 1-4) has one sharp; System 2 (Measures 5-8) has no sharps or flats; System 3 (Measures 9-12) has one sharp; System 4 (Measures 13-16) has one sharp. The time signature is common time throughout. The vocal line is in the treble clef, and the piano accompaniment is in the bass clef. Dynamics and performance instructions are included:

- System 1: Dynamics include p, cres. (Measure 4).
- System 2: Dynamics include p (Measure 1), ad lib. (Measure 2), mp a tempo. (Measure 3), f (Measure 4).
- System 3: Dynamics include p (Measure 1), f (Measure 4).
- System 4: Dynamics include rall. (Measure 1), rall. (Measure 4).

The lyrics are as follows:

These stanzas are founded upon an event of most melancholy importance to Ireland; if, as we are told by our Irish historians, it gave England the first opportunity of dividing, conquering, and enslaving us. The following are the circumstances, as related by O'Halloran. "The King of Leinster had long conceived a violent affection for Dearbhorgil, daughter to the King of Meath, and though she had been for some time married to O'Ruark, Prince of Breffni, yet could it not restrain his passion. They carried on a private correspondence, and she informed him that O'Ruark intended soon to go on a pilgrimage (an act of piety frequent in those days), and conjured him to embrace that opportunity of conveying her from a husband she detested to a lover she adored. Mac Murchad too punctually obeyed the summons, and had the lady conveyed to his capital of Ferns."—The monarch Roderic espoused the cause of O'Ruark, while Murchad fled to England, and obtained the assistance of Henry II.

"Such," adds Geraldus Cambrensis (as I find him in an old translation), "is the variable and tickle nature of woman, by whom all mischiefs in the world (for the most part) do happen and come, as may appear by Marcus Antonius, and by the destruction of Troy."

* The following are some of the original words of this wild and singular Air ; they contain rather an odd assortment of grievances :—
 Cuishlilh ma chree,
 Did you but see
 How, the rogue, he did serve me :—Bis.
 He broke my pitcher, he spilt my water,
 He kiss'd my wife, and he married my daughter !
 O Cuishlilh ma chree ! &c.

I had thought that this was the sprite which we call the Leprechaun ; but a high authority upon such subjects, Lady MORGAN (in a note upon her national and interesting novel, O'Donnel), has given a very different account of that goblin.

* In that rebellious but beautiful Song, “When Erin first rose,” there is, if I recollect right, the following line:—

“The dark chain of silence was thrown o'er the deep.”

The Chain of Silence was a sort of practical figure of rhetoric among the ancient Irish. Walker tells us of “a celebrated contention for precedence between Finn and Gaul, near Finn’s palace at Almhaim, where the attending Bards, anxious, if possible, to produce a cessation of hostilities, shook the Chain of Silence, and flung themselves among the ranks.” See also the Ode to Gaul, the Son of Morni, in Miss Brooke’s Reliques of Irish Poetry.
